YANKTON FACING DRINKING WATER ISSUES	Classic Hits 106.3 News / ESPN 1570 News	07/11/18	6:35AM 7:05AM 7:35AM 8:05AM 8:35AM	0:60 each	For the second time since this spring Yankton residents have received word that the city's water system is out of compliance due to higher-than-normal levels of trihalomethanes (THMs). The standard for THMs is 80 micrograms per liter, but over the last year, the city has averaged 87.4, 89.80 and 98.74 micrograms per liter. Director of Environmental Services Kyle Goodman says the THMs are a result of the city's chlorine treatment process. According to Goodman the chlorine is added to the water to disinfect it and kill any microbial growth. The chlorine interacts with the organic material in the water and gives a byproduct that forms the THMs. Goodman said due to some extremely high runoff events as well as some basins being out of service because of construction, there was a lot of extra nutrients in the water. Those solids are what the chlorine reacts with and causes the THMs. Even with the levels, Goodman said there isn't a major threat to the public at this time. He added that THMs are a potential cancer causing problem, but only with really excessive levels in the water for a prolonged period of time. He said it's very unlikely to happen and called the information is being shared at this time as more of a precaution. The city's new water plant, an addition to the 1972 plant, is set to begin coming online in the fall. Along with it will come regular water sourcing that nearly eliminates the causes of THMs.

The Yankton Sioux Tribe is doing everything they can to help their people, but many homes were damaged due to the high flows of water and the group has been fighting off the water with most of it coming from Lake Andes. As homes continue to be affected, tribal leaders are being asked what they plan to do to help those living in the flooded area. According to Yankton Sioux Tribe Secretary Glenford "Sam" Sully, they have been working as diligently as they can with the resources they have. Earlier this spring, Governor Noem helped the reservation and neighboring towns by raising the main road, but that's now back underwater so they're asking for the state's help yet again. The Chief of Police states the continued flooding is taking a toll on patrol vehicles. Authorities are also concerned about delayed response times for emergencies if the roads are closed off by water, calling it a life or death kind of situation. Even though trenches have been dug to try to alleviate some of the issue, it really hasn't been working. Now, the moisture is creating mold in the homes and affecting the air – that according to Yankton Sioux Tribe Chairman, Robert Flying Hawk. Tribal members say the flooding has affected their livelihood and they are trying to find solutions that will once again bring hope to current and future Yankton Sioux Tribal members.
